Saturday Night in the Diner

Five or six cups
It's the motion
in the scene
It feels natural
Then feels unatural
To drink
the black soup
of night strength
As a substitute
It works in
Degrees of people
Strong and bold
Forward and hot
Then it's time to refill and Tilt back

The coffee is rich and black, a generic brand mixed with french roast and espresso (I call it: a common french expression). This is the kind of brew that warrants (after the first sip) some statement like "This is good coffee." That is why I drink it, that is why I serve it. Ahh... ø

"Coffee?" she asked. "Is it coffee you're wanting?"

Was holding a large coffee, carrying it, in fact, a full paper cup. Held it on the upper rim. took an awkward step, and the level of the coffee came over the lip of the cup, burning the fuck out of my fingertips. had to make a split-second decision to remain clinging to the cup and suffer, or let it drop. I held on. Pain for coffee any day of the week.

These are MAGIC beans.

coffee from the blackened pot. It was very hot and very black, and it tasted good.

BY THE CUP

COFFEE COFFEE

BOSTON (AP) — Sit back and enjoy another cup of full-powered, extra-kick caffeinated coffee.

A major new study says your morning brew is almost certainly harmless to your heart.

But decaf may be another story.

Contrary to fears by many doctors and coffee lovers, coffee with a jolt of caffeine seems to be perfectly safe to the heart. However, the study found that people who drink lots of decaffeinated coffee may increase their risk of heart trouble.

"This study means that if there is a hazard with drinking caffeinated coffee, it's going to be very small, and there may be none at all," said Dr. Walter Willett, who directed the study at the Harvard School of Public Health.
